Area legislators review 2007 session highlights

Anderson, Marty and Hausman also talk about their emphases for the coming year by Dave Healy

The Bugle sat down recently with three legislators who represent out readership to talk about the recently completed 2007 state legislative session, as well as what's in store for the

1. What are you most pleased about from the 2007 session?

Sen. Ellen Anderson: This was a historic year for the environment. We passed a renewable energy standard.

something I've "We passed a renewable been working energy standard . . . that is on for the last one of the strongest in the six years. Our country." bill is one of the strongest in — Sen. Ellen Anderson the country. We passed legislation on reducing global warming. The East and West coasts have been leading the way on this issue, but Minnesota is now poised to become a leader in the Midwest. We secured $4.5 million for the St. Paul Port Authority to study steam generation at the Rock-Tenn plant.

Sen. John Marty: I think we did a pretty good job on environmental legislation. We're not where we need to be vet. especially regarding our commitments to reduce global warming, but we're getting there. We made some progress on reducing mercury pollution although, again, there's more to

Rep. Alice Hausman: We passed good bills on energy, the environment and public safety. We finally owned up to our responsibility to fund special education, which will be an enormous help for the St. Paul School District. Although we didn't pass the bonding bill, that legislation included 10 transit projects, all of which attracted statewide support. We're starting to learn that states that invest in their urban core are healthy

2. What are you most disappointed about?

Anderson: We weren't able to pass a bill to place a constitutional question on the ballot regarding dedicated funding for the environment. However, we have another year to work on that. We didn't pass a bonding bill. We got a little property tax relief but not enough, and previous cuts in local government aid were not restored, which will continue to hurt St. Paul. We didn't get as much money for education as we need.

Marty: We still don't recognize the value and importance of investing in prevention. A greater commitment to prevention would, in the long run, reduce state expenditures on crime, health care, chemical dependency and special education. We need to learn that ignoring our problems won't make them go away; they'll only get worse

Hausman: We had to scale back some of our best bills. For example, in K-12 education we

A recent Saturday morning found plein air artist Jonathan Gaetke painting Raymond Avenue where it crosses under the railroad bridge just north of Energy Park Drive. had to cut the Dream Act, which would have provided in-state college tuition for immigrants who have attended elementary, junior high and high school in Minnesota. The health bill doesn't include domestic partner benefits, which isn't even a matter of discussion anymore in the business community.

3. What will you be working on next?

Anderson: I continue to serve on the Legislative-Citizen Commission on Minnesota Resources (LCCMR). We'll be touring the state to evaluate possible environmental projects for funding with state lottery money. I think state government made some important decisions this year to improve the environment. I continue to be concerned about how we can help individ-uals make environmentally beneficial decisions.

Marty: The big thing is health care reform. We now spend $6600 per person per year in this country on health care. We can't sustain that. Health care costs will bankrupt businesses, schools and the government if we don't do something. I favor a singlepayer plan, and I'll continue my efforts in the Senate to help Minnesota be a leader on this issue, with the hope of influencing federal legislation.

Hausman: As chair of the Capital Investment Committee, I and other committee members will be touring the state to look at projects for next year's bonding bill. These are important decisions. A bonding bill of $1 billion provides employment for about 10,000 people, so there is a tremendous economic advantage to the state when government invests in infrastructure. I'll also continue my emphasis on developing a regional approach to mass transit and leveraging federal money to support Minnesota projects.

Neighbors get Rock-Tenn fuel plan update by Dave Healy

This July 4 marks the 60th year St. Anthony Park will host a community get-together and St. Paul's only Independence Day parade. Other festivities include horseshoe and volleyball behalf and the state of the state Day parade. Other testivities include horseshoe and volleyball tournaments, children's games and music, Food will be sold by the Langford Park Booster Club and Abu Nader Deli. Musical performers include Pig's Eye Jass Band, the Mommas and the Miller Brother's Band. The event is supported by citizen contributions, local businesses and the St. Anthony Park Association. Contributions can be dropped off at Park Park Association. Contributions can be dropped off at Park Midway Bank.

The Rock-Tenn fuel question looks muddier after a May 29 community forum held at Hamline University. About 90 people turned out to hear the company's plans to replace the steam heat they will lose this year to power their paper recycling

The forum was organized by Rock-Tenn Interested Neighbors, a coalition of community councils representing the neighborhoods surrounding the Midway area facility. The main purpose of the forum was to report on a recent study conducted by the Green Institute of Minneapolis evaluating the feasibility of biomass as a fuel source for Rock-Tenn's operation. According to the Green

On June 5 there were multiple reports on the SAP e-mail discussion group of possible gunshots. Police told St. Anthony Park Community Council staff that two calls were made reporting gunshot noises. No evidence was found in the reported area of any burglary. confrontation or other attack.

It is a crime to discharge a firearm in the city, and the Community Council encourages neighbors to call in the event of a noise that sounds like a gunshot. It is important to tell the operator what direction the noise seemed to be coming from.

Crime statistics are available at www.sapcc.org and from the city of St. Paul at www.stpaul.gov/ depts/police/crimerpt_12.html.

The CSM Corporation will construct a second building at their Secure Computing site on Energy Park Drive and Hwy. 280. It will be three stories high and resemble the existing building.

Cleaner air may be on the horizon

St. Anthony Park resident belped draft stricter emissions policies

by Anne Holzman

Chuck Dayton's been looking a little glum lately when he talks about the environment.

Dayton, who lives in St. Anthony Park, has dedicated a career, and untold years of volunteer time as well, to sharing his love of the outdoors and trying to ensure that the planet will be safe for human habitation for generations to come.

But in spite of a long list of successes, he hears the clock ticking and says we have about a decade to dramatically change our habits and reverse a potentially disastrous trend of global warming.

Dayton has a new audience to address on the subject, as he serves on a statewide panel convened by Gov. Pawlenty to recommend policies that will reduce Minnesota's greenhouse gas emissions.

The panel is "not a bunch of tree-huggers," Dayton said. It includes some of the state's biggest polluters, as well as municipal and tribal leaders, religious leaders and representatives of other sectors.

Dayton's environmental activism stretches back to the 1970s, when he worked to protect the Boundary Waters and was named Environmentalist of the Decade by the Minnesota chapter of the Sierra Club.

More recently, he has become alarmed by global warming — or "global weirding," as he calls it, referring to the extreme swings of temperature we experienced this spring.

experienced this spring. In January he traveled to Nashville for one of Al Gore's slide-show trainings, at which organizers learn how to explain global warming to audiences of nonscientists and urge citizens to help turn it around. Dayron said he has presented the show about 15 times since the training.

Last year he helped set up a speaking tour for environmentalist and adventurer Will Steger, who also serves on the statewide panel.

Dayton was busy at the Legislature during the last session, working on two measures, both of which passed and got the governor's signature.

One was a renewable energy standards bill that requires 25 percent of the electricity sold in Minnesota to be produced by renewable sources by 2025.

The other, a "Next Generation Energy Act," provides a state goal of reducing global warming emissions by 80 percent by 2050 (with interim goals) and puts strict restrictions on constructing new coal plants or importing coal-generated electricity unless the emissions are offset, or unless the state has a new energy plan that directly and substantially limits greenhouse gasses over time.

And before the Legislative session ended, Dayron had already attended his first meeting of the Minnesota Climate Change Advisory Group, possibly his best shot yet at helping write the state's environmental story for the next few decades.

Gov. Pawlenty announced in March that his appointed panel of 51 people will hammer out a list of policy priorities, reporting to the Legislature by February 1, 2008. The hope is that the governor will lean hard on the Legislature to bring the recommendations into law.

The big challenge, Dayton said, is that "there are only four people who are specifically from environmental groups."

Dayton was nominated by the Minnesota Center for Environmental Advocacy, where he has spent much of his threeplus years of retirement working as a volunteer lawyer.

as a volunteer lawyer.

"We are going to be vastly outnumbered," he said.

Nevertheless, he expressed optimism about the process, citing similar approaches in other states, including Arizona and

Most people don't want to think about air. We know it's there, the medium in which we live and move and have our being. We depend on it with every breath we take. But precisely because of its ubiquity, air is something we take for granted.

Increasingly, though, we can't do that. Whether our air will be clean enough not to make us sick, whether it will be free of unpleasant odors, whether it will contain low enough  $CO_2$  levels to keep the earth from overheating — these are things we find ourselves worrying about.

We'd like air to act as an invisible sponge, soaking up whatever we release into it. But we know that's unrealistic. Sometimes when we overburden the air's carrying capacity, we can see or smell the results. But air also contains pollutants that human eyes and noses cannot detect

For those things we depend on more sensitive measuring devices: machines that sense gases, particulates, oxides and the like. And because most of us lack the equipment to measure such things, we depend on other entities to monitor air quality — government agencies such as the EPA and PCA.

In our more naïve moments, we'd like to imagine that those entities would prevent the knowing discharge of any pollutants at all into the air. But the fact is you can't burn anything without leaving some residue or creating some byproduct.

So ambient air quality standards have thresholds. They talk about parts per million and include language such as this: "No owner or operator of existing indirect heating equipment shall cause to be discharged into the atmosphere from said equipment any gases which exhibit greater than 20 percent opacity, except for one six-minute period per hour of not more than 60 percent opacity."

As states go, Minnesota has a pretty good track record of protecting the air. The 2007 legislative session produced bills that increase our commitment to renewable sources of energy and reduce our CO<sub>2</sub> emissions. Legislators passed a statewide smoking ban that will greatly reduce citizens' exposure to secondhand smoke. They appropriated money to study the fuel conversion process at the Rock-Tenn plant, one of the state's single largest energy users.

Such legislation reflects the obvious fact that air is public property.

Such legislation reflects the obvious fact that air is public property Even if you own a boiler and smokestack, you don't own the air into which that stack empties. Even if you own a restaurant, the air your customers breathe wasn't written into your purchase agreement.

The complicating thing about air quality is that air moves and pollutants disperse. So power plant emissions can't just be measured at the stack. Readings must also be taken at various distances from the source. Whether you live upwind or downwind from a source of air pollution will greatly influence its effects on you. In extreme conditions, an atmospheric event — a forest fire or a volcano — can affect the air hundreds or thousands of miles away.

Even in normal conditions, the buildup of greenhouse gases in the upper atmosphere is the result of CO<sub>2</sub> emissions all over the globe. One area's efforts to cut such emissions can be offset by another's indifference.

So part of the challenge in addressing air quality is determining the arena in which the discussion takes place. Should states be allowed to have tougher standards than the federal government? Should the United States sign international agreements if other big polluters refuse to?

Another complication of air quality is that fragrance is in the nose of the smeller. Apart from its health effects, cigar smoke strikes some nonsmokers as foul, but the same person who curses at the first scent of a Havana might welcome an occasional whiff of pipe tobacco.

Even smells that apparently enjoy near universal favor may stir protests from some people. The owner of the BP station at Como and Raymond, who at one time had plans to add a Subway restaurant to a renovated facility on that corner, confronted an unexpected form of resistance. In addition to impassioned discussion about zoning changes, traffic levels, noise and general neighborhood ambience, he was astonished to hear a neighbor voice the fear that an oven at the proposed Subway would emit the smell of freshly baked bread.

And then there are odors that go beyond mere preference. Some people are allergic to the smell of perfume and may suffer asthmatic symptoms in its presence. Should we therefore legislate scent-free workplaces and public buildings?

"What's in a name?" asked Shakespeare. "That which we call a rose / By any other name would smell as sweet."

A more vexing question would have been, "What's in a smell?" And what happens when we don't agree on its sweetness?

Rock-Tenn from 1

Institute's Carl Nelson, Rock-Tenn's steam needs are considerable. Nelson said the plant requires enough thermal energy to heat 20 percent of the entire city of St. Paul.

Currently that energy is generated at Excel Energy's High Bridge power plant and comes to Rock-Tenn in the form of pipedin steam. That source will disappear this year as the High Bridge plant is converted from coal to natural gas.

coal to natural gas.

Rock-Tenn has its own burners on site and is currently equipped and licensed to burn fuel oil and natural gas. Those burners have been used as a back up, but starting this fall they will be used to supply all the plant's energy needs.

The company would like to find a long-term alternative to carbon-based fuel, and that desire prompted the Green Institute study. Based on the study's findings, though, biomass doesn't appear to be the maric bullet.

appear to be the magic bullet.
"No'cheap biomass' is available that will beat natural gas prices long term," said Nelson. He said they considered six forms of biomass — urban wood waste, forest residue, agricultural milling residue (e.g., oat hulls), crop residue (e.g., corn stalks) and dedicated crops (e.g., grasses) — and concluded that none would provide much more than 50 percent of Rock-Tenn's energy needs.

Nelson said that nonfuel costs — building and managing a plant, transporting materials, disposing of ash — are higher than actual fuel costs for any form of biomass. He said another factor the study considered was the long-term stability of markets for biomass.

"Currently, there is competition for many of these materials, and we expect that competition to increase," he said.

Another consideration with biomass is the sheer volume of material a Rock-Tenn power plant would need. Nelson said such a facility would require about 10,000 semitrailers a year of biomass.

Another potential fuel source for Rock-Tenn is refuse-derived fuel (RDF), but no one at the May 29 forum expressed much enthusiasm for that option. Sen. Ellen Anderson, who sponsored a recently passed bill (SF 2096) that dedicates $4.5 million to the St. Paul Port Authority to study Rock-Tenn's energy needs, said the bill specifically excludes untreated mixed municipal waste but does not exclude RDF, which is waste that has been shredded and processed into pellets for burning. She said that RDF was not excluded in the bill because some legislators believe that fuel source needs more study.

During the question-andanswer part of the forum, several citizens spoke against an RDF burner, and it's clear that such a facility would face stiff public pressure. Indeed, a group of area residents, Neighbors Against the Burner, has been formed. They held a June 19 public meeting at Macalester College.

According to Ken Smith, from District Energy of St. Paul, studies about the fuel mix and plant configuration at the Rock-Tenn site will be completed by the end of the year. The environmental review process will begin in 2008. Air permits and financing arrangements are expected to be completed by 2009. Design and construction would begin at that point, and the new facility would be ready to begin operation sometime in 2011.

More immediately, a group will be formed to assure continuing citizen representation in discussions about Rock-Tenn's energy future. The Rock-Tenn Community Advisory Panel will meet monthly and will include members from four St. Paul district councils (11, 12, 13 and 14), the city of St. Paul, District Energy, the St. Paul Port Authority, Ramsey County, the St. Paul and Midway chambers of commerce, and four at-large representatives.

This is the president (until August) of the Northern Lights 4-H Club. We had our pie social on Friday, June 1, and though it rained at the beginning, we had a great turnout and everyone there had a great time.

We would like to thank St. Matthew's Episcopal Church for large tables, the city of Lauderdale for chairs and card tables, Luther Seminary for the beautiful site, Dunn Bros. Coffee for their generous donation of coffee, and the St. Anthony Park Community Band for the music. The Force is truly with all these groups!

In addition, the club would like to thank all the people who came out and supported our only fundraiser by buying pies. The pie social couldn't be successful without the community. Watch for our pie social next year, and thanks again.

You can go home again (but bring the wine)

by Dave Healy

There's nothing particularly high tech about wine. So how did a couple of techies end up with their own winery?

Annie Shull, co-owner with her husband, Scott, of Raptor Ridge Winery in Oregon describes their life as "a hobby gone awry."

In the mid-1990s the two, not vet married, were working for Sequent Computer Systems in Beaverton, Oregon. Several years earlier Scott had started making wine for fun, tried out the products on friends and received some positive feedback He kept at it, and eventually he decided to go commercial. Through Scott, Annie got interested in wine, and when Sequent was bought out by IBM, she worked briefly for a small winery in the area. The two were married in 1998, and the administrative and marketing end of Raptor Ridge became a fulltime job for Annie.

She grew up as Annie Christensen on Dudley Avenue in St. Anthony Park, where her parents, Marge and Jack, still live. Annie went to St. Anthony Park Elementary, Murray Junior High and Como High School. In junior high and high school, she worked at Bibelot.

The Shulls will be back in St. Anthony Park during the first week in July. They'll visit family and take in the Fourth of July celebration at Langford Park. And on Tuesday, July 3, from 4 to 7 p.m., they'll join the Little Wine Shoppe in hosting a tasting of their wines in the Milton Square courtyard.

A $5 donation will be requested at the tasting, with the proceeds being used to benefit the Raptor Center at the University of Minnesota.

Jeff Huff, co-owner of the Little Wine Shoppe, learned about Raptor Ridge from Annie's father, Jack Christensen. A year ago Huff attended the Oregon Pinot Camp, where he heard more good things about Raptor Ridge.

Scott and Annie Shull own the Raptor Ridge Winery in Oregon. They will bring samples of their pinot to a July 3 Milton Square wine tasting hosted by the Little Wine Shoppe. For more information about their wines, visit www.raptoridge.com. For more about the Little Wine Shoppe, visit www.thelittlewineshoppe.com.

"I'm amazed how many Minnesota connections there are in the wine business," he said.

The Little Wine Shoppe carries the Raptor Ridge pinot noir and pinot gris, and just around the corner, Muffuletta Restaurant sells the pinot gris.

That corner, by the way -

Como and Carter — is where Annie Christensen wielded an orange flag as a school patrol in sixth grade. On July 3 she'll be back at the same intersection, but this time she'll trade her flag for a carafe in hopes of introducing her old neighborhood to her new passion: pinot.

by Kristi Curry Rogers

Greetings, No Bones readers!

The summer is in full swing and has already been completely filled with research trips for my family and me.

Last month found us in New York, studying the collections at the American Museum of Natural History and Stony Brook University.

This month we're just returning from a whirlwind trip to Chicago's Field Museum of Natural History.

The Field Museum is among my favorite museums in the world — and believe me, I've visited a lot of museums with dinosaurs. The Field will always hold a special place in my heart because it was the first place that I saw dinosaurs in person.

When I was 13, my family

When I was 15, my family took a vacation to Chicago over spring break. The only place I cared about visiting was the Field Museum. My mom gave up two whole days of shopping so that I could get my fill of the dinosaurs before heading home.

In those days the museum's disosaurs were very old-fashioned, with tails dragging in staid, traditional skeletal poses. I still loved it, and now I miss a bit of the old "reverence" of the quiet dinosaur galleries.

Nowadays the Field Museum's dinosaur and paleontology galleries are alive and up to the minute. In one exhibition, called "Evolving Planet," my own dinosaur, Rapetosaurus, holds a place of honor as a mounted skeleton. And of course there is Sue, the marvelous tyrannosaurus skeleton that is the centerpiece of the huge museum.

Though I still love museum exhibitions, I have to admit that my biggest thrill these days when I visit museums is working behind the scenes.

Like most natural history museums, the Field Museum has a hefty research staff and an incredible collection.

While I was there, I spent nearly every day deep in the bowels of the museum, pulling out drawer after drawer of extraordinary dinosaur fossil material and climbing up onto shelves containing thighbones much larger than me, and ribs over nine feet long.

Because of our agreement with the Malagasy government, the Field Museum is the official repository for fossils that will remain in the United States. (At least half of the bones will eventually go back to Madagascar). The museum takes care of the fossils, cleans them and provides researchers access to them.

I was there to borrow some fossils that relate to the dinosaur I'm working on describing: the enigmatic "Malagasy Taxon B." In other words, the long-necked dino that isn't Rapetosaurus.

At the end of our time in the collection, we loaded up a truck full of bones to carry back to the Science Museum of Minnesota, where I'll spend the summer studying, describing and eventually naming this strange new animal.

It is unbelievably fun to have time on the research floors of these great old natural history museums. One of the crates we brought home dates from the early 1900s, with the name of the stalwart old paleontologist who sent home his fossils from the field proudly stamped on the side.

History is rich in these places. It is an amazing feeling to be a part of the new world of dinosaurs and still be connected to all those who came before.

Until next time, happy summer. I'm off to name a dinosaur!

DECEMBER 2, 2007 - 4:00 P.M. $25 Annual Gus Donhowe Memorial Concert When you're done with that juice box or milk carton, don't toss it in the trash. Instead, add it to your recycling bin.

Since January, residents of St. Paul, Maplewood, Roseville and Lauderdale have been able to recycle milk cartons and juice boxes. It's estimated that people in those communities throw more than 550 tons of these cartons in the trash each year.

According to Susan Hubbard of Eureka Recycling, only a portion of what people are using is currently being collected.

"We want to collect every juice box and milk carton available, to meet the city's goal of zero waste," said Hubbard.

In 2006, Terra Pak, a leading producer of liquid foods packaging, received a grant from the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency, making it possible to recycle this packaging in Minnesota for the first time. They are partnering with Eureka Recycling, which provides curbside recycling service.

Common products that can be recycled are milk cartons, juice boxes, soup and broth cartons, and soy and rice beverage cartons. Cartons should be placed with bottles and cans — not paper.

Recycled cartons can be made into paper towels and tissues, according to Ed Klein, vice president of public and environmental affairs for Tetra Pak.

"It's rewarding to see this program take off," said Tina Patton, market development specialist for the Minnesota Pollution Control Agency. "We know we will see positive environmental results, and we're especially pleased to see that Tetra Pak and Eureka Recycling are adding an education component to reach even more people." Residents can also call a Residents can also call a recycling hotline at 651-222-SORT for additional information.

Eureka Recycling is a nonprofit organization that specializes in recycling and waste reduction and has managed St. Paul's recycling program for nearly two decades.

Tetra Pak, the world leader in complete packaging and processing systems for food products, was founded in 1952 in Sweden and now operates in more than 165 markets around the globe. Tetra Pak Inc., the U.S. and Canada market company, was established in 1984 and is headquartered in Vernon Hills, Illinois.

Eureka Recycling driver Gary Carlson, collecting on a recent Wednesday in St. Anthony Park, said he's seeing more people recycling milk and juice cartons.

I started talking to owls 20 years

Hearned to do hoots in the rhythm of the phrase "Who cooks for you?" That's the memory trick we use to remember the barred owl call: Hoo, hoo, ho, hooooo.

It was pretty exciting when an owl responded. And for the most part, they've been pretty good about calling back. That is, until lately.

Every May, I take part in the St. Paul Audubon Society's weekend retreat at the Villa Maria in Frontenac, Minnesota, along the Mississippi River just south of Red Wing. I help lead morning and afternoon bird walks, and at night I lead an owl walk.

On Friday night this year we tried the old Frontenac cemetery, where there are Civil War graves. A barred owl had been heard near the cemetery earlier in the evening. Our group got there about 9:30. It's pretty eerie to be in a pitch-dark cemetery calling and listening for an owl.

We tried calling with a recording I have. Getting no response, I tried my own vocal imitation of a barred owl. Still no owls responded.

The fireflies, however, were spectacular. And we saw a satellite trace a path among the stars. We called it an evening and headed off to bed.

Saturday night we went a few miles down the highway to Hok-Si-La Park, near Lake City. We headed into a broad meadow. ringed with trees, and came to an area where we'd heard owls in the past. Again, pitch dark. And again, nothing but fireflies.

We haven't had very good luck finding owls the last several years. I can rationalize by saying that we're calling them right in the middle of their nesting

Our calls seem to be most effective when owls are defending territory or setting up house keeping. They think our call is a rival owl and come to see who we

But by May they've settled on territories, chosen mates, laid eggs and are incubating them. In some years, they may already be feeding little owlets. They really don't have time to chase around the woods looking to see who else is in town.

But they used to respond in May three or four years ago.

What's changed?
Well, perhaps there's less habitat and fewer owls. Perhaps there's been a loss of prey through residential development, agricultural practices, competition from other predators.

We got to discussing the possibilities after our most recent unsuccessful outing. My friend Paul wondered about the tape recording I was using. He thought that perhaps the owls were getting used to it after hearing it all these years.

The recording I use was probably made in the southern United States because you can hear chuck-will's-widows calling in the background. That's a southern version of our whippoorwill, another bird that can call its name all night long.

So a discerning barred owl might think, "Hmm . . . chuck-will's-widows here in Minnesota. I don't think so. Must be that guy with the tape again.

What's worse is that when I made the tape, I started recording from the source tape too soon, and I've got the narrator saying "Barred owl" in a deep baritone before the owl itself starts calling. I tell the folks in the owling group that's so the owls know who we're talking to.

Those of us who've been leading owl walks for a few years regale the crowd with quips and puns. When you can't deliver owls or any other promised bird species, you've got to give the people something for their money. (Although since it's free, I guess they're getting their money's worth.)

If we hear a dog bark on the other side of the woods, I identify that as a "barked" owl. Or if a train whistle sounds out in the night, I call out, "There's a Great Northern."

Last year, a young man brought his fiancée along on the owl walk. He had gone on his first one 10 years earlier. After it was over, he said, "Same lame jokes as ten years ago.

After the cemetery trip this year, one new birder in my car said, "You know, I'd come back again just for the humor.

That confirms my philosophy that you can still have fun even if you don't find the birds.

I guess I'll keep doing it until it's not fun anym Knowing the group I bird with, that's going to be a long time.

Knowing when to take the plunge

by Michelle Christianson

How do you get to be one of the Minneapolis/St. Paul Business Journal's "40 Under Forty" business leaders? According to Andrew Eklund, you have to know when to take the plunge Eklund grew up in St. Anthony Park and graduated from St. Olaf College with a degree in political science.

While working for a graphic arts trade association, he attended a MacWorld conference in 1995 that opened his eyes to the Internet's potential. He approached one of the trade association's members about a possible collaboration and after just a year bought the company

"It was trial by fire," says the 38-year-old. "I didn't have time to get an MBA. I knew this was my chance to get in early and I iust did it.'

It was a choice that paid off. Eklund is now CEO of Ciceron, a successful Web marketing firm.

And as one of this year's 40 Under Forty, he's mentioned in the same breath as Margaret Anderson Kelliher, speaker of the Minnesota House of Representatives, and Derek Sharrer, general manager of the St. Paul Saints.

Ciceron (the name is derived from the Italian cicerone, meaning "a guide for sight-seers") helps companies optimize their Web strategies. Eklund's employees will analyze a company's business strategy, find its audiences, often redesign its Web site and related online marketing programs, and then continually measure, evaluate and improve the results.

They decide whether to target search engines; initiate e-mail marketing to specific audiences; start a Web campaign; use word-of-mouth marketing, podcasting, online video or a combination of these tactics.

The company also does trademark policing and monitoring to make sure no one is using their clients' names illegally.

The company was doing so well that in 2001 they had 33 employees and billed $180,000 of revenue in August of that year.

But after September 11, revenues fell sharply and the company had to reduce staff. It's one of Eklund's proudest achievements that he helped almost all of those employees find new jobs.

Despite this setback, Ciceron bounced back. The company now has 13 employees and is planning to hire more. When asked what kind of person he's searching for, Eklund says, "I just look for the smartest person in the class who is computer savvy and uses technology as an integral part of his or her everyday life. Most new hires start as generalists and then we decide where they will best fit into the company.

Among Ciceron's clients are Andersen Windows, Meet Minneapolis (the tourist and convention bureau for Minneapolis), The Rake magazine and USBank.

In addition, Eklund has done work for many nonprofits such as the Walker Art Center, Public Radio International, Zenon Dance Theater and J.J. Hill Library. He is on the board of the Metropolitan Symphony Orchestra and has done much community work.

Eklund lives in Roseville with his wife, Allison, and children Jonas and Loren, but his heart is still in St. Anthony Park.

"I'd love to see some more public gathering places," he says.
"Maybe a wine bar in the old Park Hardware building.'

Don't assume he wouldn't be involved — Eklund has changed direction before.

New Mexico, that have shown encouraging results. The logic of the "stakeholder" approach, which is being pursued in about 30 states, loosely coordinated by the Center for Climate Strategies in Washington, D.C., is that "it's necessary to bring the polluters on board with any plan that's actually going to work,' according to Dayton.

It's also necessary to bring enough political clout to the table to get policy priorities passed into law. Minnesora's panel includes 3M, Xcel Energy and Northwest Airlines representatives. Indeed, fully a third of the group comes from corporate powers responsible for much of the state's greenhouse gas emissions

Dayton said the governor's recent commitment gives him

"This governor came out with a message on energy and the environment last December,' Dayton said, "in which he went farther than anyone, Democrat or Republican, has ever gone" in proposing severe limits on a tight schedule. "He seems to get it on global warming."

The panel, which met for the first time in April, began with a list of about 300 policy changes that legislatures might use to reduce emissions.

"The process is one of narrowing that list down to one that is acceptable to all or many on the panel," Dayton said.

Much of the work is being done in subgroups of about 20 people, known as technical working groups. Their meetings, which are conference calls, will be open to the public in the form of access to a phone line at the Minnesota Pollution Control

For more information about those meetings, as well as extensive background and procedural rules, see the Minnesota Climate Change Advisory Group's Web site at www.mnclimatechange.us.

Dayton serves on the residential, industrial and commercial working group.

"A lot of that will have to do with how we can save energy — energy efficiency," Dayton said.

Dayton said he expects the panel as a whole to discuss some "fairly obvious" measures. including strict emissions limits, cap-and-trade approaches, and ways "to create a cost for putting greenhouse gases into the air. Right now it's free."

People need incentives to develop emission-reducing methods, he said, so the panel will have to consider proposing

Beyond the moral imperative of doing the right thing for the sake of future generations, Dayton cited some practical reasons why Minnesota just might gather the political will to change its emissions habits.

"I think we are at that point nationally where there's a broad recognition that this issue has to be dealt with," he said, "and also that there are opportunities for business.

Someone has to design, test, manufacture and distribute new technologies, he pointed out, whether the aim is to remove pollution already in the air, contain it as it leaves the smokestacks, or meet needs for energy and other resources without emitting greenhouse gases in the first place.

"The opportunities are going to come to those states that move quickly" to require such innovations, he said.

As an example, he said, consider our buildings — all of them, collectively — and what it takes to build, heat and maintain them.

"It's a huge percentage of the energy we use," he said, and the people who can build better buildings, in environmental terms, will have a competitive advantage as environmental concerns become more widespread.

Ultimately, Dayton believes there will be federal cap-andtrade on emissions as well as a strengthening of other environmental policies.

"The states that move forward early will be at an advantage" in that case, he said.

Dayton has his work cut out for him, in the form of piles of reading material and a heavy schedule of subgroup and fullpanel meetings over the next six months, plus the job of persuading some fellow panelists who may have good reasons to drag their feet. He's tackling the project with energy and optimism.

"A really good outcome would be a set of recommendations adopted unanimously or nearly unanimously, which can get broad support in the Legislature and can put us on the road to reducing greenhouse gas emissions by the middle of the century," Dayton said.

Your health. Your partner.

With a toast to the last day of school and the arrival of hot summer weather, students at St. Anthony Park Elementary School raised their cups and enjoyed cool, creamy root beer floats.

On Tuesday afternoon, June 12, they gathered in front of Tim and Tom's Speedy Market, where a canopy and tables were set up. Several parents were on hand to scoop the vanilla ice cream and hand out cups to students as they made their way home.

One of the volunteers was not a parent. Jane Hakensen was there out of friendship and perhaps for old time's sake.

Standing on the corner of Como and Doswell avenues reminded her of the days when she was a fountain girl at Millers Drug Store just across the street, now the site of Vine & Branches, serving root beer for a nickel.

She says that seeing the group of excited kids as they walked home from school reminded her of when she was a student in the neighborhood. She is proud to say that she is a member of the first graduating class from St. Anthony Park Elementary.

Hakensen remembers the day that students moved from Gutterson Elementary School, which used to stand where the St. Anthony Park United Methodist Church parking lot is now, a building so old that when it got too cold in winter, the school would close for a "boiler day" because there was a risk that the boiler would blow up if it had to work too hard.

On moving day, students loaded their arms with books, globes and whatever they could carry and walked down the hill along Knapp to the brand new school called St. Anthony Park Elementary.

Hakensen's eyes shine as she talks about the happy memories she has of growing up in St. Anthony Park.

"I hope it's the same now," she says. "In those days, everybody knew everybody. Moms were everyone's moms. You didn't dare get into trouble."

Hakensen Keeps up with families in the neighborhood through her friendship with the Thomey family. She enjoys spending time with Katie and Nick and their three children: Lilly (fifth grade), Joe (third grade) and Nora (a preschooler).

When Lilly lamented the closing of Gingko in the Park, where she would often stop for an ice cream treat after school last year, Hakensen proposed the idea of serving root beer floats on the last day of school.

Katie Thomey contacted Speedy Market and recruited fellow parents Jenny Bell Nielsen,

Jane Hakensen helps make root beer floats for St. Anthony Park Elementary students to celebrate the last day of school.

Ann Commers and Julie Swanson to help out.

Hakensen volunteered to pay for the ice cream and root beer. Speedy Market provided the canopy and tables as well as cups and spoons. The event was well attended and over 200 root beer floats were served.

Hakensen is retired after 40 years as a flight attendant and purser with Northwest Airlines. She has traveled all over the world but has settled near her St. Anthony Park roots. She now lives in her mother's former home on Keston Street.

Hakensen is co-owner of Antiques at the Pharmacy in North St. Paul and volunteers at the Wildlife Rehabilitation Center of Minnesota in Roseville. Thomey insisted on a banner, pinned to the edge of the canopy where root beer floats were served, thanking Jane Hakensen.

"I don't like the attention," says Hakensen. "I had a ball doing it. The children were so gracious and appreciative."

Students can look forward to root beer and ice cream again next year on the last day of school.

"As long as I'm alive, we'll do this every year," promises Hakensen.

AMERICAN LIFE IN POETRY

By Ted Kooser, U.S. Poet Laureate, 2004-2006

Each of the senses has a way of evoking time and place. In this bittersweet poem by Jeffrey Harrison of Massachusetts, birdsong offers reassurance as the speaker copes with loss.

Visitation

Walking past the open window, she is surprised by the song of the white-throated sparrow and stops to listen. She has been thinking of the dead ones she loves — her father who lived over a century, and her oldest son, suddenly gone at forty-seven — and she can't help thinking she has called them back, that they are calling her in the voices of these birds passing through Ohio on their spring migration . . . because, after years of summers in upstate New York, the white-throat has become something like the family bird. Her father used to stop whatever he was doing and point out its clear, whistling song. She hears it again: "Poor Sam Peabody Peabody Peabody." She tries not to think, "Poor Andy," but she has already thought it, and now she is weeping. But then she hears another, so clear, it's as if the bird were in the room with her, or in her head, telling her that everything will be all right. She cannot see them from her second-story window they are hidden in the new leaves of the old maple, or behind the white blossoms of the dogwood but she stands and listens, knowing they will stay for only a few days before moving on.

the Twin Cities and began working at General Mills, where her father was director of research. It was there she resumed a friendship with Sidney Miller, whom she married in 1942.

When daughter Mary was born, Barbara became a full-time homemaker for many years. During that time she was active in the St. Anthony Park community, especially at St. Anthony Park United Church of Christ.

When Sidney died suddenly in 1963, she returned to work on the St. Paul campus of the university, with the Department of Agricultural Economics. There she especially enjoyed spending time with foreign students, something that had been part of her life growing up.

Barbara retired in 1976 and then began an active life of travel, volunteering for several organizations and spending time with family. One of her great joys was serving for many years on the board of the Elmer L. and Eleanor I. Andersen Foundation.

During the past few years, Barbara lived at Rosewood Estate of Highland. She was a woman with a never-ending curiosity who loved to explore and learn.
