With a little nervousness and a lot of excitement, they slid their crafts into the water. This was the first launch of two hand-crafted boats that had been occupying these eight builders for almost three months.

The project that brought these students to McCarron Lake was a collaboration between the Hubert H. Humphey Job Corps Center, located in the Como Park neighborhood, and Urban Boatbuilders, a youth service agency in St. Paul. It was the brainchild of Job Corps instructor Renee Peek.

Building boats is only the first step in a much larger project that Peek dreamed up.

Eventually it will involve floating the boats on the Mississippi River, visiting several river towns and writing a book about the experience.

Peek got the idea after discovering that books about Mississippi River towns in Minpson and the seither far of feeting. She making all the late of the control of the seither far of feeting She making all the late of the seither far of the seither fa

"Students like a bit of story involvement," she said. "I thought it would be nice for them to contribute a book that was both fact and fiction. And the boats themselves are just the first step in a very long project."

The November 21 launch was a great success. "It was cold and windy," Peek said, Tackling something completely new and trying to do it as a group was sometimes stressful. Peck said, an observation confirmed by the students.

Highway 280's neighbors grow desperate for sound wall

Heavyiertraffic on Highway 280 since the I-35W bridge collapse last August has spurred renewed efforts to get sound walls completed along the road where

For at least 30 years, St. Anthony Park and Lauderdale residents have been debating the need for sound walls. Some lament the loss of a view to the have doubled since vehicles from 35W got rerouted onto 280, with dramatic increases in noise levels. Greiling said she fears recent decibel levels may be dangerous to the ears, especially for children playing outdoors. There may be a way to protect the view, she said, but "we have to have that sound wall."

She said there is also concern that a driver could lose control and crash into a garage or house. MnDOT area engineer Marc Goess, who has been working with neighborhood groups, said the sound wall is "the best long-term solution." He conceded that resurfacing might also help but said it would wear out over the years.

He said he and others at MnDOT are "searching around trying to find funding" for the wall, and that it might be eligible for federal funding associated with the bridge collapse.

A St. Anthony Park group, Citizens Concerned for Habitable Neighborhoods, organized a meeting in November that drew city and state officials to talk with residents about possibilities for noise abatement.

The Lauderdale City Council addressed the issue at an informational meeting in October and has posted a summary on its Web site (www.ci.lauderdale.mn.us). The site also encourages interested citizens to write to Minnesota Transportation Commissioner
Carol Molnau

Carol Molnau.

Greiling said that she's glad to get letters from residents but that she's already exploring every option she can reach to make the project happen, starring with her own letter to Molnau last fall, to which, as of mid-December, there was "still no answer." By all means write to your representatives, she said, "but don't stop with us."

Greiling said getting the governor and the transportation commissioner (who is also lieutenant governor in the current administration) to allocate money would be the quickest, surest route to seeing the wall put in place. State law allows sound walls under two conditions: in connection with a major project, and as part of a long list generated by MnDOT traffic studies.

Greiling is arguing that the continual upgrading of Highway 280 should be declared a major project, allowing the sound wall to bypass the statewide waiting list.

She said she's also working with legislative leaders to get the project included in this year's transportation bill as a backup plan in case federal dollars pass it by.

by.

The Citizens Concerned group is pursuing resolutions in favor of the sound wall in remaining areas of St. Anthony Park as well as Lauderdale. Organizer Gaye Larson said MnDOT told her group they'd need to show that the neighborhood is united behind the request. The group hopes to secure support from the St. Paul

City Council soon.

Larson, who lives on Bourne Avenue, said she's been in this fight for many years. The existing length of sound wall, she said, "didn't just fall out of the sky." Greiling said desire for the Greiling said desire for the wall has been building in recent years in Lauderdale but that the sudden increase in traffic has made the project more urgent and at the same time presented the opportunity to secure federal highway funds focused on the bridge collapse.

"If we miss this opportunity; Greiling said, "I think that come spring, when the windows are open, there's gonna be hell to pay."

"Life," wrote John Lennon, "is what happens to you while you're busy

"Life," wrote John Lennon, "is what happens to you while you're busy making other plans."

The limitations of planning are fairly obvious. For one thing, life doesn't stop and wait while you plan for the future. For another, planning can become an excuse for inaction. How convenient, when asked why you haven't started writing that paper yet, to reply that you "need to do a little more work on the outline first."

But while the traps confronting the planner are evident, the dangers of not planning are even more apparent. There's plenty of proverbial wisdom to that effect: Look before you leap. He who fails to standard the first of the Marsure graine cuts once.

proverbal wisdom to that effect. Look before you leap. Fie Who Lains to plan, plans to fall. Measure twice, cut once.

Sometimes, poor or nonexistent planning bears fruit immediately. You didn't bring your umbrella, and half way to the bus stop it starts raining. Other times, lack of planning takes awhile to show its effects. Such is usually the case with urban planning, a prominent example of which is road construction.

which is road construction.

Consider the case of Highway 280.

As a Minnesota trunk highway, 280 is enshrined in the state's legislative code, specifically Minnesota Statute 161.115, Subdivision 211, which describes it as 'beginning at a point on St. Anthony Avenue in St. Paul; thence extending in a general northerly direction to a point on Route No. 63, at or near New Brighton."

Although that sounds pretty definitive, 280 actually evolved over many years, according to highway historian Steve Riner. He says that Highway 280 was authorized in 1949 and that originally its southern receiving the No. 186 of the No.

terminus was MN-36, later Kasota Avenue, then University Avenue and finally I-94. Its northern terminus, originally U.S. 8 in New and image 57.1. So the relations, originary 0.3. on 1 vew Brighton, is now 1-55W.

Its piecemeal construction is reflected in 280's patchwork of entrance and exit ramps, which range from long and leisurely to short and panic-inducing. If St. Paul's network of streets could, in the words of a former governor, be attributed to the efforts of drunken Irishmen, then 280 can lay claim to a multiethnic legacy of inebriation unparalleled in the annals of road construction.

Highway 280 is an example par excellence of what poor planning will get you. And its defects have become all the more glaring in recent months as it has been obliged to pick up the slack for a missing bridge over the Mississippi River.

But, some might say, it wouldn't be fair to indict the highway engineers of a half century ago for failing to anticipate the demands of serving as a limb between two freeways.—94 and 35 W— that didn't exist then, much less the pressure that would arise from the necessity to close part of 35 W after a bridge collapse.

So perhaps we shouldn't be too hard on the roadway architects of yesteryear. Perhaps we should grant that they did the best they could with what they knew at the time.

with what they knew at the time.

On the other hand, the whole premise of planning is that what you know at the time should be used to prepare for what you don't you know at the time should be used to prepare for what you don't know about the future.

For example, what if, a century ago, we had taken a page from New York Ciry's book and dug a subway. Yes, it would have been expensive and disruprive. But it would have been feasible. Now, of course, it's too late for subways.

In the case of 280, it's not too late for noise walls, or reconstructed interchanges, or better lighting. But those things come with costs—much higher costs if they're implemented now rather than years ago.

There are some signs that we're getting better at transportation along the work with in and a proper property of the property in and along the property of the property in and the property of the property in the property of the property

There are some signs that were getting better at transportation planning. We're talking more about various forms of rail travel in and around the metro area. We're saking what the best route for a Central Corridor IAT line should be. We're pulling out our crystal balls and trying to predict what the future holds. This well and good, but in all this deliberating we would do well to remember the colloquialized words of the poet: "The best-laid plans of the poet."

Credit program founder

I'm delighted to have read the article about my former neighbor, Gen Nakanishi, in Lisa Steinmann's Volunteering Matters column in the December Bugle. However, I want to correct one thing.

The column stated that Murray's first volunteer coordinator started in the mid-80s. Actually, the tutorial program was introduced in 1970, during Reno Rossini's tenure as principal, by myself and Ruth McGovern In fact, Murray was the first high school in St. Paul to have an inschool tutoring program.

After Ruth left, I coordinated the tutoring program alone until Jane Bergstrom teamed up with me in the mid-70s. In 1974, along with Bette Svendersen, supervisor of volunteer services for the St. Paul schools, we arranged with the H.B. Fuller Co. to have their employees tutor at Murray another first for the school. I'm glad that Gen Nakanishi is continuing this important program. I know it's in competent hands.

But that Monday night, my birding buddy Bill called asking if I'd like to go to Two Harbors to look for the Inca dove.

It had been seen regularly for a week. We'd be up and back in a day, and he'd drive. And, it was the first reported sighting of an Inca dove in Minnesota. I couldn't resist.

As it turned out, I had to cancel my participation in a meeting scheduled for the next morning, which Val would be attending. I took some static when I told her the reason for my absence.

The Inca dove is smaller than our common mourning dove, about four inches shorter in length, shorter even than the robin. It's buff colored with a beautiful scalloped, scale-like pattern in the feathers on the back. The Inca dove's normal habitat is the southwestern United States, but they're known to wander quite a bit during migration. So this bird was most likely just spreading its wings after leaving home.

The dove had been reported visiting a yard behind a Two Harbors house. We found the house, drove around to the alley and watched the feeders for a while. They looked empty. No birds in sight. Then I saw a flock of pigeons fly over. They appeared to be landing in the yard at the end of the alley behind us, so we pulled out onto the street, parked across from the house and watched the yard through the car's side

There was a pickup truck in the driveway between us and the pigeons, so we had to crouch down and crane our necks to survey the flock through the truck's underside. Within a few minutes, we noticed a much smaller bird among the pigeons pecking the ground. We made out that it was indeed the Inca dove.

indeed the Inca dove.
Just then, a Jeep pulled up behind us. It appeared to be another bird watcher, so I turned and waved to him, gave him a thumbs-up and pointed to where the bird was. He waved back. I asked Bill to pull up a bit to give the Jeep driver a chance to see the bird.

Suddenly, all the pigeons flushed. The dove headed to the top of the cedars that bordered the yard.

It turned out that the man behind us was Jim Lind, who had reported the bird a week earlier and whose yard the empty feeders were in where Bill and I had

Jim is an avid and experienced bird watcher. He said he'd been out on his back deck, not really looking for any birds, when the Inca dove first flew by and landed in that same yard at the end of the alley.

Jim knew it was a special bird. He ran down the block, studied it, got some photos and posted the sighting on the Minnesota Ornithologists' Union's (MOU) Web site.

Jim said his neighbors were getting caught up in the excitement of having a rare bird in the neighborhood. The man whose yard the bird seemed to be favoring was gladly spreading birdseed in his back yard.

There was some debate on the MOU Web site about whether feeding the bird was just prolonging the inevitable, since it vas so far out of its range so late in the year (it was November). Wasn't it doomed?

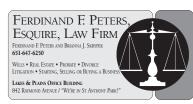

Laura Erickson, a bird expert from Duluth, said that if Jim and his neighbors closed down their feeding stations, it wouldn't send the Inca dove back to Texas or Mexico. Its migratory instinct is apparently out of alignment and it would merely search out another source of food, maybe even heading farther north.

She said that birds like this wandering Inca dove "might as well have the same benefits we give our other backyard birds. They certainly face the same, or greater, hazards, and most of those hazards come from other changes we humans have presented them with. Might as well give them one little gift, Wouldn't a feeder full of birdseed be a welcome sight after traveling more than a thousand miles in the wrong direction? Must be a male.

In November, students worked on drawing and painting projects. Kindergarteners completed art books with pages about the primary colors, shapes, patterns and textures. They were excited to bring them home to share with their families.

First graders have been painting up a storm and learning about printing. They did a fall trees monoprint, created their own fish stamp and will continue with line printing.

In second grade, artists

In second grade, artists created creature paintings and wrote poems to go along with them. They had fun doing figure drawing with costumes and now are working on animal art.

Third graders did still-life watercolor painting of fall objects. Fourth graders are learning about positive and negative space and creating collages in the style of Henri Matisse. All month, fifth- and sixth-grade artists worked on a tessellation project. A tessellation is a repeating design made famous by the artist M.C. Escher.

"Always choose the high road. Be the best that you can be. Lead the fight to do what's right and take responsibility."

That's the message in the thirdgrade musical "Pass it On," which will be performed on Friday, January 18. Third-grade teachers Jeff Budin, Kathleen Maguire and Lena Mayer will codirect students in a performance that is eagerly anticipated each year.

Eleven Destination ImagiNation teams, third through sixth grade, are rehearsing for competition this spring. Students who choose to participate meet after school and practice creativity and problem-solving activities.
